THE SEALEY BUYING GUIDE TO MIG WELDERS

View our current range of MIG Welders here:

MIG welding involves a wire fed from a spool in the welder unit, which runs through a hose to a handheld torch. The wire performs two jobs; it supplies voltage to melt the metal being welded, and acts as a filler. The process offers high productivity, as the wire is continuously fed.

Gas is used to shield the weld from impurities which would cause the weld to become porous and weak. The gas is fed from a gas bottle mounted on the welder unit, up through the hose to a gas cup at the end of the torch. The gas can be easily blown away, particularly when working outdoors, resulting in poor quality welds. In recent years, Gasless MIG welders have become popular. They use a specialised flux coated wire to shield the weld, enabling them to be used outside.

WIRE

The wire performs two jobs; it supplies voltage to melt the metal being welded, and acts as a filler.

The main difference between flux-core and MIG welding is that flux-core welding does not require a shielding gas which makes it more portable. The self-shielding flux-cored wire provides the shielding gas when burned. This makes flux-core more suited to welding in windy conditions.

- FLUX-CORED WIRE
- ✓ No gas bottle required.
 - ✓ Can be used outdoors.
 - ✓ Works through paint, rust and dirt.
 - ✗ Produces slag and spatter.
 - ✗ Cannot weld Aluminium.
 - ✗ More expensive.

- SOLID MIG WIRE
- ✓ No slag, little spatter.
 - ✓ Handles thin metal well.
 - ✓ Produces cleaner welds.
 - ✗ Longer to set-up.
 - ✗ Needs clean surface.
 - ✗ Requires gas bottle.

TYPES OF GAS & INDUSTRIAL GAS SUPPLY

CO₂
CO₂ CARBON DIOXIDE
Used for mild steel.

CO₂/ARGON
CO₂/ARGON
A mixture of 20% Carbon Dioxide and 80% Argon which gives a smoother and cleaner weld than pure CO₂.

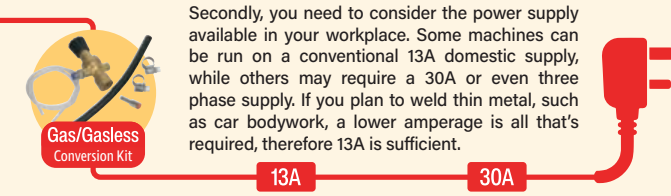

ARGON
ARGON
Used for aluminium.

THERE ARE THREE TYPES OF GAS USED:
If you plan to run your machine on gas, you need to consider how much welding you plan to do. Lower amperage machines tend to use small disposable or re-fillable bottles. If you plan to do a lot of welding, a large industrial gas bottle will be more economical. However, your welder will need to be converted to cater for the larger bottles. Larger amperage welders are designed for use with industrial gas bottles.

ENVIRONMENT & POWER SUPPLY

Location — Gasless — Gas

The first consideration when purchasing a MIG welder is where you intend to weld. If you plan to work outdoors, you need to purchase a MIG capable of gasless welding. Usually, these machines can be easily converted to run with or without gas.

Secondly, you need to consider the power supply available in your workplace. Some machines can be run on a conventional 13A domestic supply, while others may require a 30A or even three phase supply. If you plan to weld thin metal, such as car bodywork, a lower amperage is all that's required, therefore 13A is sufficient.

TORCH & HOSE

EURO CONNECTION ENABLES QUICK AND SIMPLE PLUG CONNECTION TO WELDER.

EURO TORCH NON LIVE TORCH

Larger MIG welders include welding torches and hoses with a bayonet type connector. This allows the user to easily change between hoses/torches, which is particularly important if you frequently weld different types of metal i.e., mild steel to aluminium. Old school MIG welders have a permanently live torch, but most modern machines have a switch in the torch to turn on the voltage, feed the wire and turn on the gas supply. This is a safer and easier method and used in all SEALEY MIG welders.

DUTY CYCLE

The duty cycle of a welder reflects how long it can weld in a 10-minute period before it must cool down. For example, with a duty cycle of 60% at 100A the welder can be operated continuously for 6mins before it will need a 4min cool down period.

Generally, duty cycle isn't important for automotive repair work, as the amps tend to be low (higher duty cycle at lower amps). If you plan to carry out a lot of welding, the duty cycle is a very important consideration when comparing welders.

SAFETY

MIG welders create very hot temperatures and emit a very bright light, which can cause severe damage to both exposed skin and eyesight. Therefore, it is essential to wear the correct safety equipment.

COMPRESSOR BUYING GUIDE

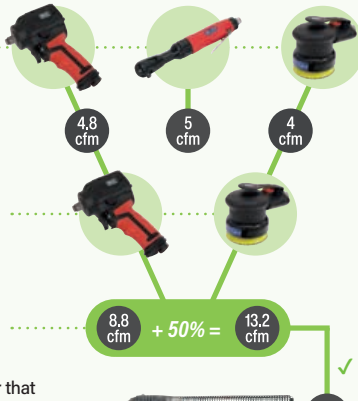

OUTPUT

Each air tool has a cfm rating, which defines the amount of air required to power the tool in cubic feet per minute.

Determine the highest cfm rating of the air tools you intend to use. If you intend using more than one tool at the same time, you will need to add the ratings of both tools to calculate the total cfm rating.

A 50% safety margin then needs to be added e.g. a 4cfm tool would require a 6cfm output compressor.

Now you can look for the compressor that produces a high enough cfm output for your needs. When comparing models, ensure that you are reviewing the Free Air Delivery and not Air Displacement.

ELECTRIC OR PETROL DRIVEN

If you plan to use the compressor away from your premises, where there's no electrical supply, you will need to opt for a petrol version.

You will also need to check whether your power supply is adequate to run the compressor. Some larger compressors cannot be run from a 13A socket.

BELT DRIVE

DIRECT DRIVE

Compressors can be quite noisy.

Belt driven machines are quieter than direct drive versions, but some compressors have noise suppressing casings to reduce noise pollution. Screw compressors are even quieter. A low noise compressor is also an option, allowing use indoors and closer proximity to the unit, due to the increased exposure times to the noise levels being permitted.

SILENT COMPRESSOR

NOISE

OIL LUBRICATED OR OIL-FREE

Oil-free compressors need less maintenance compared to versions that require oil and therefore incur more regular servicing and increased running costs. Some applications will also need air that has no oil contaminants, so an oil-free compressor is essential for this. If running standard air power tools, then an oil lubricated compressor would not be an issue, and these can also have a longer life, due to less friction and wear within the unit.

WE STOCK A WIDE RANGE OF COMPRESSOR OIL FOR MOST COMPRESSORS.

AMOUNT OF USAGE

Compressors need to cool down between regeneration periods. Regeneration is when the pump replaces the air that has been used from the compressor's air tank. If you need to frequently/continuously run your compressor, such as on a production line or bodyshop, you may want to consider a screw compressor. These are designed for heavy-duty applications.

TANK SIZE

The size of the tank will determine how long you can use your air tools before needing to let the tank fill up again.

A longer job, such as sanding will require a larger compressor. Sanding with a 4cfm SA7/S will require a compressor with a minimum Free Air Delivery of 6cfm.

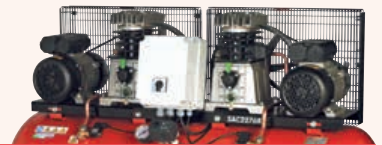

An air tool that requires a higher air output will drain the tank quicker than one that needs a lower air output, so the size you need depends on the job at hand and how long the task will take.

RECEIVER CAPACITY

HORSEPOWER

1.5hp 2hp 3hp 5.5hp 6.5hp

Air compressors typically have a horsepower rating between 1.5 and 6.5 and is a measure of the amount of work an engine can perform.

The higher the horsepower, the quicker the air is replaced in the air tank.

It is always worth looking at either the air accessories you already own or ones that would be great to accompany your new compressor.

This will allow less downtime between each job. It also allows the motor to work for shorter periods of time.

AIR HOSE REEL

Air hoses, or an air hose reel, will help the delivery of air to your tools. Different airline couplings may be required to allow the maximum potential from your air tools and to permit the use of multiple air lines from the one compressor.

AIR COUPLINGS

A regulator fitted in the airline to allow for a consistent pressure to be delivered to an air tool or a water trap, a lubricator or air filter may be worth investing in, depending on the application. Although, you must ensure that all accessories match the specifications of the compressor being purchased.

POWERFUL PERFORMANCE

The SV20 series is our most powerful One-Battery range - highly suited to heavy-duty tasks. High outputs are achieved without compromising on operating time. With the option of two batteries, our kits ensure you can keep working while you recharge.

VERSATILITY

With a variety of tool bodies, single or twin chargers and a choice of lithium-ion batteries, the SV20 series provides the most versatile way to build your own cordless tool kit over time.

MOBILITY

Our cordless tools offer greater manoeuvrability around your workspace, whilst design features ensure they are comfortable and easy-to-use. For protection and portability, our kits are supplied with a handy storage bag.

Brushless motors offer high efficiency, resulting in a better runtime, improved performance and greater durability. They are also quieter and lighter and require less maintenance than brushed equivalents.

The series provides a choice of lithium batteries ranging from 2Ah, for faster charge, up to 6Ah for longer-lasting runtimes.

For advice on selecting the right battery, scan the QR code.
